An Exciting Blog Post

Parachuting (Sky-jumping) is an action sport, in which the parachutists exit an aircraft and return to the Earth with the aid of gravity, by slowing down the last part of the descent with the help of a parachute. It is performed as a recreational activity and a competitive sport. It is used in the deployment of military personnel airborne forces. It is also used occasionally by the forest firefighters.

Parachuting is performed from both, the lower and higher altitudes. If the jump is taken from a lower altitude, then the parachute gets deployed immediately; however, if the jump is taken from the higher altitudes, then the skydiver may first free-fall for approximately 1 minute, and then would deploy the main parachute. The aircrafts required for the parachuting involves light aircrafts, such as a Cessna 172 or Cessna 182. At busier drop zones (DZs) larger turbine-powered aircraft may also be used, which involves the Cessna 208, de Havilland Canada DHC-6 Twin Otter, GippsAero GA8 Airvan or Short SC.7 Skyvan.

The Parachutists ride to the high altitudes in a light aircraft, fly to the 'drop zone' and then exit the aircraft. In parachuting, the parachute opens first, and then the jumper controls the direction and speed with the help of the toggles situated at the end of steering lines. The toggles are further attached to the trailing edge of the parachute, from where the jumper aims towards the landing site and lands with a gentle stop. People make their first parachute jump with help of an experienced and trained instructor.
